See: Retrospectio Review II, 304-324. D'Israeli's Quarrels of authors, II, 231, and Miscellaneous in prose by Aikin and Barbault. Brunet II, 534.

First edition. Lowndes, p. 595: This poem on its appearance was attacked by the wits of the day to which the author replied. Butler quizzes it in his argument to the first Canto to Hudibras.

Hunter says it gives an indication of the popularity of 'Romeo and Juliet' as there are scenes laid in Verona and a character named Tybalt. There seems to be absolutely no proof to support the suggestion of Aubrey that D' Avenant was a natural son of Shakespeare.
